

AlpNet: Alpine tourism gathers its strength

Ten leading alpine tourist organisations from Austria, Germany, Italy, France and Switzerland join forces to meet the challenges they have in common even better in future.

Economic crises and unpredictable events – unstable conditions have almost become the norm for the tourist industry. Military conflicts on Europe's doorstep, extreme fluctuations in exchange rates, freak weather events, climate change and, last but not least, bargain-hunting guests who increasingly book at the last minute – these are only some of the challenges being faced by the industry.

For European tourism in the Alps, rapid responses to these challenges are particularly important: with about 375 million overnight stays per year, the Alps count as one of the most tourism-intensive regions in the world, situated in a geographically and climatically sensitive environment. Measured against the rapid growth in world tourism, the alpine region is stagnating in the competition between international destinations.

With the founding of AlpNet, ten of the leading tourist organisations in the Alps have decided to confront the global challenges together, and in so doing to strengthen alpine tourism in all its facets. In the short term, the focus will be on four areas which are equally important for all destinations: the future of winter sports; new alpine summer attractions; sustainability and added value; and new markets for holidays in the Alps.
